

Call for Good Practices 2023

ELA is launching the second edition of the Call for Good Practices 2023
This year the call will aim to collect good practice examples in the fields of:

- Construction
- Preventing social security fraud

Why participate?

European recognition for the performance, visibility on ELA's website, good practice exchange among Member States, contribution to the effective application and enforcement of EU labour mobility law within the EU.

Who can apply?

Member State administrations and stakeholders operating at the national, regional or local level, including social security institutions, civil society and social partner organisations.

How to submit a good practice?

Priorities for 2023

Construction – good practices:

- tackling the challenges related to posting of workers, free movement, coordination of social security systems and dissemination of information to workers and employers
- reaching out to posted workers in the construction sector and involving them in dedicated events
- tackling labour and skills shortages, enhancing the attractiveness of a sector, provide access to the sector/occupation through training, awareness raising or information provision, and improved matching between jobseekers and employers

Preventing social security fraud – good practices:

- tackling frauds related to the entitlement of benefits misaligned with work
- tackling the deceitful use of pension schemes and other social protection measures linked not only to posting, but also to the free movement of workers within the EU
- enhancing cooperation among different Member States' social security bodies, including cross-checking of information between social security registers of Member States
- establishing tools and measures tackling the misuse of social benefits
